British Government Presents Library With Important Facsimile of the Domesday Book

A facsimile edition of England's oldest and most important historical document—William the Conqueror's Domesday Book—has been presented at a small, invitational ceremony at the Library of Congress, on November 24.

Sir Antony Acland, British Ambassador to the United States, presented the first complete facsimile edition of the Domesday Book to The Librarian of Congress, Daniel J. Boorstin. The facsimile was produced by the British publisher, Alecto Historical Editions, at the request of the British Public Record Office.

The Domesday Book is "the most valuable piece of antiquity possessed by any nation," according to the 18th-century philosopher David Hume. It is a two-million-word manuscript completed in 1086. This year thus marks its 900th anniversary.

The Domesday Book was an attempt to bring order out of the chaos that followed the pivotal Battle of Hastings (1066). William the Conqueror followed his historic victory by systematically transferring large English estates to Norman ownership. Within 20 years the sometimes bloody dispossessions had taken place. The Domesday book is a survey and record of land ownership and related data for taxation and other purposes. It was authorized by William the Conqueror Christmas 1085 and completed the following year. It remained the most complete survey of England for nearly 800 years, and its precedents have been cited as recently as 1965.

The facsimile was produced last year when the Domesday manuscript was unbound for repairs and conservation. Color separations were taken directly from the unbound folios. A continuous-tone lithography printing process, specially formulated papers and inks, and indexing and analysis by computer have all contributed to the facsimile edition and ancillary parts. The two facsimile volumes alone weigh more than 50 pounds. In addition, the Library will receive a new translation, a series of maps reconstructing 11th-century England, indexes to the manuscript, and a computerized version of the Domesday Book prepared by scholars at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

The facsimile edition will be placed in the Library's Rare Book and Special Collections Division, where it will be available for examination by scholars and other readers.

The gift of the important facsimile is but the latest in a series of acts of cooperation between the Library of Congress and the British government, the most dramatic of which was the Library's acceptance of the Lincoln Cathedral Magna Carta for protective custody during World War II, 1939–1946.
